Who's Defining Education for Your Child?: A Guide for African American Parents Dr. Richard Mathew Williams

This is a book every African American parent should have. It points out how African American parents can build educational success for their child in spite of the negative effects of history and tradition. It outlines the steps necessary for parents to counter these effects. This book provides solutions by helping frame a strong definition of education, as well as how to create a home environment to support the definition. This is a timeless parental involvement tool which should benefit any parent and child who follows the advice. Randy Brown, Parent, Education Advocate in Cobb County Georgia Who's Defining Education for Your Child compiles a list of proven and practical suggestions, anchored in a timeless principle that can be easily implemented by parents today, if they are committed to developing a strong "mindset" for education in themselves and in their children. Dr. Lolethia Kibble, Title II Specialist, Virginia Department of Education Dr. and Mrs. Williams have created a profound piece of literature that is a "wake up call" to all stakeholders in the educational process of our African American students. They have set the platform for both much needed discussion and reform, in the way we value, relate to, and understand education. I have been inspired by the truths presented in this book, and will certainly use it as a springboard as to how I view the "teacher/learner" cultural and climate in my classroom. Nadine Lucate Pierre, Teacher In order to ensure that students receive the educational opportunities that prepare them for the challenges of the 21st century, parents must motivate their children to engage in learning so they can achieve school success. "Who's Defining Education for Your Child?" provides some concrete strategies for parents to help address the issues that short circuit the academic success of African American youth and it illustrates a compelling story for why you can't just let others define educational experiences for your child. Dr. Kimberly Matier, Deputy Chief Academic Officer, Minneapolis Minnesota
